Journalist's Socialization: Main Impetus for Good Governance

Jivan Dhungana*

Abstract

Under the theoretical framework of Harold Lasswell's Communication Theory, this study focuses on the role that journalists' socialization plays in shaping the social understanding of good governance through the use of the media. In the age of social media and technology, it is obvious that people learn a lot from the various media they use in their lives and how they act. As, Harold Lasswell proposes that there is consistently connection between the communicator, message, medium and the beneficiary, it is a colossal test of the communicator or the source to spread the positive and advantageous message to the collector or the crowd. The sender is the most important factor in moving society in a particular progressive direction. Because of this, the journalist's role in society is most important in shaping society. However, the journalist's mindset is formed before socialization, while the audience's life is shaped by the media and political leaders' codes of conduct. Journalism, on the other hand, is not unaffected by national politics because individuals enrol in various programs for their own benefit. As a result, the primary focus of this study on journalists' socialization for good governance in Nepal is on Lasswell's communication model: who says what, how it affects whom, and why.

Keywords: socialization, communication, journalist, journalism, media and good governance

Introduction

Journalists may indeed inform society about itself but such a formulation falls far short of an adequate definition. Journalism is defined by Dennis McQuail as paid writing (and the audiovisual equivalent) for public media with reference to actual and ongoing events of public relevance. (Harcup, 2022, p. 5)

* MPhil/PhD. Scholar.
A journalist is a person who indeed gathers information from society to inform the same society about that gathered information in a systematic and well-balanced manner.

Although journalists inform society about themselves, this definition is far from adequate. Dennis McQuail defines journalism as paid writing (and its audiovisual counterpart) for public media about current and past events of public relevance (Harcup, 2022, p. 5). A journalist is someone who actually gathers information from society in order to inform that society in a systematic and pertinent manner. McQuail defines journalism as the paid writing that a journalist does for the public about relevant societal events. Therefore, journalists construct a particular notion for socialization that emerges through socialization. This supports Lasswell's model of communication, in which a journalist uses the socialization effect to spread a message across various media, such as television, radio, and newspapers that have a significant impact on society. The principal essence of the review spins around this thought. Additionally, good governance can result from the journalist's work for the community.

A bunch of practices through which data is found out and conveyed, frequently including unveiling what might somehow be private, and which is commonly distributed or communicated in a configuration like a paper, magazine, notice, narrative, site, or blog. Making new, relevant, and factual information available to the public is the part of journalism; however, it also includes amplifying. Journalism is the practice of disseminating information about any events, happenings, or story from the society through various mediums like newspaper, magazines, bulletin, blog, vlog, websites, and other social media like YouTube, Twitter, and Facebook (Harcup, 2014 a:148) (Harcup, 2022, p. 6). Contextualizing, or commenting on facts and comments that have already been made public... The study's main focus is on making journalists responsible, reliable, and valid in the interest of good governance. Messages are critical as they can propel individuals to contribute to the great administration from their end.

A broad term that refers to any and all forms of control, regulation, and direction that are used in some kind of institutional process and involve multiple agencies, both formal and informal, public and private. In accordance with the cultural and social roles fulfilled, the term has come to refer to media structures that are typically organized in the form of networks that are open to many inputs and not completely autocratic. Good governance is essential for a society's control, regulation, and direction (McQuail, 2010, p. 558). It plays a part in society's social and cultural roles. The study looks at how journalists can play a role in fostering good governance. The study emphasizes that journalists' socialization is largely responsible for governance's success or failure.

It is true that journalists' socialization is crucial to the socialization of society's population. Writers, as a part of the news media, are supposed to drive the general public towards the right heading. The socialization of columnists shapes the manner in which they foster stories and this impacts the mentality of individuals. "In his inaugural address, "Radical Media Ethics: Stephen Ward asserts in "Responding to a Revolution" (Harald Hornmoen and Kristin Skare Orgeret, 2014, p. 11) that journalism ought to have an ethical impulse in order to advance social justice, human flourishing, and democratic structures worldwide. This implies that the columnists are the heads of the general public who shape the morals and conduct of the general public through various media. Writers have the capacity to both build and ruin the general public and hence their socialization can drive them towards gaining commitment to headway and flourishing of the general public.

In 1940, the first known mention of Harold D. Lasswell's communication model occurs 75 years later, in 2015. In acknowledgement of this achievement, this paper returns to Lasswell's renowned development, "who, got out whatever, in which channel, to whom, with what impact?" by offering a printed investigation of its reasonable development throughout recent years (Sapienza, Lyer and Veenstra, 2015, pp. 599-600).

The communication theory of Lasswell serves as the basis for the theoretical framework of this study. The correspondence hypothesis created in 1940s has brought transformative changes and has aided the further improvement of correspondence speculations through the idea of who expresses out loud, whatever, in which channel, to whom, with what impact. Additionally, this theory provides a theoretical framework for the investigation of the impact of journalists' socialization in Nepal. As a result, Lasswell's model of communication favors all channels through which information is shared.

The value of Lasswell's model for communication scholars is assessed in light of a rapidly shifting media landscape. Finally, we reason that Lasswell's model is both an important and helpful idea for the field today, regardless of a few misinterpretations encompassing it (Sapienza, Lyer and Veenstra, 2015, p. 600).

The primary focal point of the review is socialization of columnists. The role of the journalist and the social context are connected to Lasswell's notions of who says what and to what effect. As a result, journalists' socialization has a significant impact on strengthening their contribution to good governance.
Besides, the socialization of columnists has a gigantic effect on the progression of information in the general public as the most common way of learning and connecting people with social norms, rules and values is known as socialization. Major social actors can be socialized through the media. Journalists are always on the lookout for personal experiences that are shaped by interactions with social groups. People are pressured to make different choices by cultural norms and social personalities. Journalists with sufficient knowledge and experience can influence individuals to accept their role in good governance through this process and an appropriate media outlet.

The lives of individuals are both youthful and not entirely settled by the different impacts of family, companions, society, religion and broad communications. The patterns of influence in people's lives have changed as a result of technological advancement. The reporters learn in the newsroom through practice and interaction.

The process of teaching innocent individuals the skills, behavior patterns, values, and motivations necessary for competent functioning in the culture in which the child is growing up is referred to as socialization. Principal amongst these is the interactive abilities, social understandings, and close-to-home development required for the collaboration with others to find a place for the working of social dyads and bigger gatherings. As a result, one's social, economic, intellectual, environmental, physical, and vocational factors have a significant impact on one's life. These can be supported through news-casting. It cannot be denied that our time is one of the media. The public is now dependent on the media, which expose them to a wide range of issues and obstacles. What's more, columnists, through submitting to the constitution and regulations, can exhibit socialization of nobility, responsibility, responsiveness, productivity, straightforwardness and drive the general public towards great administration.

Statement of the Problem

This study is focused on the following issues:

- The issue of whether the journalists are following norms and values of the profession has been pressing as many journalists are criticized for being guided by personal benefits and spreading false information for the same.

- Another burning issue this study explores into is the partisan press prevalent in our country that has badly affected the process of good governance.
Objectives

- To explore into the journalists’ role in the process of socialization.
- To assess the existing media practices in connection with good governance.

Journalist

Journalists are just like any other person—they provide services that are seen by a large number of people. Their ability to quickly and effectively convey messages to large audiences gives them omnipotence (Kharel, 2012, p. 100). Instead of demobilizing audiences into passivity or merely acting as cheerleaders, they should make them feel like active participants who freely give and receive feedback. However, journalists, like other members of society, bear the greatest responsibility for rapidly disseminating information. As a result, it is their responsibility to engage the audience in order to gather their opinions and learn more about the state of society and its inhabitants. Therefore, the journalists' socialization is crucial to the dissemination of truthful information throughout society in order to achieve good governance.

Socialization

However, there are some fundamental assumptions about the potential effects of media on socialization that are frequently incorporated into media control policies, media-related decisions, and parental norms and expectations regarding their children's media use. In fact, there are two sides to the media socialization hypothesis: from one viewpoint, the media can build up and uphold different organizations of socialization; on different, they are likewise seen as an expected danger to the qualities set by guardians, instructors and different specialists of social control (McQuail, 2010, p. 492). It goes without saying that people learn from their surroundings, experiences, and contexts; As a result, journalists advance within society. Additionally, journalists are able to convey pertinent information to society through socialization. Because their output typically reflects their socialization, it is crucial. During pandemics like COVID-19, this may inspire people to properly wash their hands and wear face masks. Additionally, this aids in effective socialization. In the end, accountable journalism practices can contribute to improved governance.

Media

Media's primary function is to provide the public or audiences with accurate, fair, and impartial information in order to inform, educate, entertain, and shape public opinion. Worldwide, these are the fundamental premises. Nonetheless, there is a fundamental inquiry: Are these roles played by the media? Or the media are simply raising awareness of the issues to serve their vested interests? It is abundantly clear that all the media have a social responsibility. Are they aware of this? (Television, 2020, p. vii). It is true that information from society is transmitted through the media on a variety of topics. This kind of information must be true and based on certain ethical principles. The effect on society depends on how the media person delivers the message from a particular medium in a particular pattern. It's possible that people who work in the media convey the same message because of their socialization. Similarly, society's good governance is facilitated by the information's reliability and validity.

Education

Media education has the potential to enhance the performance of communicators, media content, and public awareness. News-casting and mass correspondence schooling have maintained a critical improvement in South Asian nations in later times. The beyond 30 years have been especially remarkable. Education is the foundation of every aspect of life that contributes to people's success and advancement (Kharel, 2010, p. 44). Knowledge that has the potential to make people aware is the education. Here, media training contributes in different aspects of an individual like improvement of correspondence expertise, character and tracking down arrangements of issues. Additionally, we should be wary of misleading information because it may have a negative impact on individuals. The socialization of media users demonstrates that media education is one of the necessary factors for understanding the reality, situation, and circumstance of the society and nation.

At the point when individuals gain legitimate information through media, they find out about the social, political, and monetary circumstance of the country. Columnists can exhibit support, agreement, responsibility, straightforwardness, responsiveness, incorporation and vote based rehearses that might be useful to the course of good administration.

A media-educated society turns out to be more particular and discerning while getting and handling data contents. Those while getting and handling data contents. Those who lack media literacy will have a difficult time distinguishing between balanced and distorted messages, as well as accuracy and inaccuracy. Knowledge is the most important factor in analyzing issues and events for the literate. Similarly, Kharel speaks of a society that is media-literate; When it comes to acquiring information from the media through journalists, society can be selective and discerning. In like manner, Lasswell specifies that the correspondence relies upon who expresses out loud whatever, through which media and with what impacts. He characterizes the model through the point of view of crowd that the crowd also bears the obligation to grasp the data thus clearly the crowd see just when they are media-proficient. Thus, socialization of both the columnist and the crowd is the basis for the positive change in a general public.

Journalism

When taken literally, journalism means the output or work of professional "newspeople." As item it regularly implies enlightening reports of ongoing or recent developments important to people in general. In this sense, journalism is another word for "news," and it has many of the same characteristics as news, especially the goal of being current, relevant, credible, and interesting to a particular audience. McQuail, 2010, p. 561) Journalism is essentially the process of educating the public through the journalist's socialization and knowledge. Journalism, which is regarded as the fourth estate, bears a significant responsibility for improving governance. Clearly there are numerous parts of good administration. From the perspective of journalism, it can be accomplished by having a free press, being democratic, being accountable, being transparent, and being responsible.

Good Governance

Governance that works well is not as simple as holding elections. On the off chance that Saudi Arabia is a "rich totalitarianism", Egypt can be named an "monetarily hopeless dictatorship". Both are trustworthy Western allies. These regimes fall into chaos and disaster as a result of a lack of free public debate on important topics and significant citizen participation in state decisions. Kharel, 2012, p. 26) Participation, consensus, a free press, accountability, transparency, responsiveness, and inclusion are all hallmarks of good governance. However, maintaining them in a developing nation like Nepal is difficult. A society's morals and sense of responsibility can be enhanced by good governance. Consequently, columnists' legitimate socialization is vital in accomplishing great administration.

Qualitative Method

Through the theory of Lasswell's communication theory in relation to socialization, the study employs the qualitative method. The majority of the data and resources used in the study came from secondary sources, most of which were obtained from libraries. As a result, this study exemplifies the qualitative research method, which tends to refute the notion that journalists serve as the primary monitors of society or its members.
Theoretical Framework : Lasswell’s Communication Theory

Lasswell has been described as a “one-man university” (McDougal, 1979, p. 676) and as a “Leonardo da Vinci of the behavioral sciences” (Rogers, 1986, p. 99) due to his contributions to a diverse range of disciplines such as political science, communication, law, philosophy, psychology, psychiatry, sociology, anthropology, and economics. He is considered to be the founding father of political psychology (Post, 2001) and helped legitimize the study of mass communication into a viable field of scholarly research (Berelson, 1959; Eadie, 2011; Jansen, 2010; Malin, 2011; Rogers, 1986; Wahl-Jorgensen, 2004). Lasswell was also a methodological innovator.” (Sapienza, Lyer & Veenstra, 2015, p. 601)

This write up takes the base of the communication theory of Harold Lasswell.

As media, journalism and journalist are the major issues in this paper, Lasswell’s communication theory has established relevance in the study process. Lasswell’s construct is used as an umbrella term when referencing his commonly quoted “who, said what, in which channel, to whom, and with what effect?” The intent behind this is to ensure that it covers the gamut of possible interpretations of his construct of communication without referencing any one in particular (Sapienza, Lyer & Veenstra, 2015, p. 602).

Laswells’s Communication Model that defines who says what, in which channel, to whom, with what effect has the direct relation to the means of communication. The media bears the tangible power as it can make or break the society. They also realized that they could complete the communication cycle by creating a new channel, one based in academic research, which would serve as a platform for society’s voice. Not only was the committee firmly grounded in conceptions of two-way communication, they also believed it was their responsibility to find ways to complete the communication cycle in instances when existing channels could not. Lasswell shared a similar conception as the committee. In fact, Lasswell wrote about the importance of two-way communication in his 1948 article” (Sapienza, Lyer & Veenstra, 2015, pp. 605-606).

Despite critics arguing Lasswell’s communication model presenting only one-way communication, he has presented communication as two-way process in his article of 1948 where he states that in order to complete the communication cycle, there is a need of responsibility of the receivers to find the ways of communication in the case that existing channel fails to complete the cycle. So, this writing with the base of Lasswell’s Communication Theory presents the responsibility of the journalists to the society in order to achieve good governance through their socialization.
Discussion

Through their work as journalists, they acquire a tremendous amount of knowledge. They can acquire education from a variety of sources. Families, friends, classmates, educational establishments, and society are all included. Resting of writers depends on the socialization they follow. When it comes to developing professional journalists' competencies, education plays a crucial role. Through a variety of comprehensive and practical training programs, journalism courses have evolved into a means of acquiring advanced media topics and policy skills. Therefore, the likelihood of improving society's governance is increased by the number of literate and ideal journalists. In this cycle, the precision of data is pivotal while socialization of columnists is fundamental. The media's advertisements and economic activities in the business and other sectors are significantly contributing to society's financial balance.

Also, guideline of news-casting and general set of rules give guide for columnists. News coverage should be directed from public trust, honesty, decency, autonomy, responsibility and humankind. Good governance is made possible by this guiding principle. With regards to Nepal, news contents are affected by political establishments and powers. The operations of many media outlets are not transparent. Press Chautari, a union affiliated with CPN UML, and Press Union, a union affiliated with the Nepali Congress, both have a significant number of journalists as members. Similarly, writers are found abusing their calling to turn out to be near pioneers and gain individual advantages. Some want to be appointed to various political positions, while others want to run for general elections. Likewise, the political pioneers make an honest effort to control and impact the press in order to make their exposure and gain favor. Journalism is, therefore, at risk and cannot effectively contribute to good governance until such ill practices are widespread.

Findings

Journalism is the powerful tool of mass communication and socialization is the grammar of journalism. Media sociology is affected by different influences. Socialization plays the fundamental role to shape the mindset of journalists and ultimately bring about social change through journalism practices. Hence, socialization of journalists plays crucial role in enhancing good governance.

Conclusion

The status of good governance depends largely upon appropriate socialization of journalists. The role of journalists can make a huge difference in leading society towards prosperity. So applying appropriate communication model as per the background and context of certain society is important in the process of enhancing good governance. News coverage should be driven by public trust, honesty, decency, autonomy, responsibility and humankind. Good governance is made possible by this guiding principle. The operations of many media outlets are not transparent. Similarly, writers are found abusing their calling to turn out to be near pioneers and gain individual advantages. Media sociology is affected by different influences.
